factor in business affairs this year but there is likely to be a material expansion in general trade as soon as the elections are held. This is because a great number of enterprises loon essence that belches forth daily are usually held up pending the outcome of a presidential contest, or until it is known how the next congress will stand. It seems fair to assume that the campaign will end without any unfavorable developments to unsettle business affairs, and that the present struggle will pass into history as being one of the most interesting that the country has seen and at the same time one which has really offered the least possible disturbance to general trade. A notable feature of the present situation is the continued prosperity of retail trade and the very satisfactory volumn of business which is being done by department stores in most of the important cities in the United States.'
